The tale begins when Douglas is dispatched to France on a secret mission for the British government just as he is to marry the beautiful Melissande Chambers. He sends his cousin Tony Parrish to act as his proxy during the ceremony, but the bride and substitute groom fall in love and elope. They return to carry on with the proxy wedding, making Melissande's younger sister Alexandra the bride. Douglas is predictably annoyed when he returns and arrogantly makes this very clear to his unwanted wife. He rebuffs Alexandra's attempts to earn his favor until she wises up and tries to run off. The Heiress Bride - featuring the good works of a 16th-century ghost (who's picked up a partner) to help out a new bride with her Scots bridegroom, a castle, and assorted nasty beings. Colin Kinross, seventh Earl of Ashburnham, sets out for London (in 1807) to find an heiress and save his people from dire straits. There, at a ball, young Sinjun (called "Joan" by Colin because it's more feminine) spots the "massively built" Scot and proposes herself as Colin's heiress and wife-to-be. They marry, and it's off to Colin's Scottish castle after a family fuss and other matters - only to be followed by the rumor that Colin did in his first wife and pitched her over a cliff!. In the castle greeting Sinjun: two stepchildren who are hostile as hornets; a terrible Aunt; and, nearby, a feuding neighbor, brother of Wife #1. Also, sex (page after warm page) is a chore until enlightenment comes. Meanwhile, there'll be deaths, lots of chirping and charging about by Sinjun, masterly roars by Colin, and an ectoplasmic duet by a brace of helpful ghosts
